The problem is that we need to deal with a comma separated list of two, so we need to use the str_getcsv function.Let's review this example:Here's a sample document:You can paste this string into the XML editor of your preferred content management system (CMS) and save it as a flat file.You can then upload it to the site using the Upload plugin. 2 Comments I saw your blog post about and ran across it, just when I needed it. This software seems great. I'm wondering, though, if this software is well suited to the sort of transliteration that the project I'm working on requires. Basically, the software is going to be used to generate transcripts that are meant to be viewed on mobile devices. It looks like the documentation for is available here. I'm going to try to give this software a shot, but I thought I'd check in here in case anyone else might have had success or is curious about it.Takeda then explained that people have problems with persistent non-melancholic depression which may also respond to other medications like gabapentin (an anti-seizure). Although he took these drugs to treat his depression, Takeda also noted that his depression didn't respond to the drugs and didn't go away for quite some time. He had a better response to bupropion (Wellbutrin), a medication for people with both MDD and ADHD. Bupropion appears to have two very different effects, some of which are quite therapeutic for the person with depression. The first is that it boosts the release of the neurotransmitters dopamine and norepinephrine which can help to boost mood. The second effect is that bupropion acts like an antidepressant as well, meaning that it reduces the amount of serotonin in the brain. This seems to result in less euphoria and a kind of depression-like state. Takeda was initially given a rather small dose of 200 mg of bupropion per day. This helped him get over a rather depressed phase, but he still had a mild depression which he described as "low
